“Tartuffe Final Act”

The Act V of “Tartuffe”, written by one of the famous comic dramatists Moliere criticizes mainly on religion, trust and importance of family. Moliere presented Tartuffe, a religious hypocrite as an innocent and religious guy, but in real he was secretly planning to take all his friend’s property. He tried to ruin Orgon and his family’s life. Orgon and his mother believed Tartuffe more than anything whereas other members were against Tartuffe. Orgon wants his daughter Mariane to get married with Tartuffe because he is religious and Orgon thinks that Tartuffe can protect his family and house from sin. Orgon wanted to see his daughter happy and he believed that Tartuffe would love her and make her happy. On the other hand, Orgon's other family members blame Tartuffe as a bad guy who tried to misbehave Orgon’s wife. But at the end of the play, Tartuffe shows his real face. Tartuffe took an advantage of friendship and trust. Because of Tartuffe, Orgon’s happy family were separated. Tartuffe tried to capture Orgon’s property and tried to kick out Orgon and his family from their own house.

In this play, Tartuffe is the main character who tried to cheat Orgon and tried to take Orgon’s property. Throughout the play, Tartuffe played game behind his innocence. Although Orgon’s family were against Tartuffe, Orgon supported Tartuffe. Orgon kicked out his own son because his son was against Tartuffe. Orgon almost destroyed his own family because of his trust towards Tartuffe. But when Orgon saw the proof when Tartuffe was talking with Elmire, Orgon was shocked and he realized that Tartuffe was a bad guy. Tartuffe showed his devil face by misbehaving Elmire. In spite of these evidences, Orgon's mother did not believe that because she believed Tartuffe was a good and a religious guy. Later, Tartuffe send someone to warn Orgon's family to leave their own house. Tartuffe tried to capture all property of Orgon. But at the end, Exempt, the King gave justice for Orgon's family by returning their property back to them. The King knew that Tartuffe was a liar, and his innocent character was fake.

In conclusion, Tartuffe tried to get all the property of Orgon's, but he was not successful. He created conflicts and misunderstandings between Orgon's family. Tartuffe was happy when Orgon kicked out his son from house. But at the end, Tartuffe was not successful in his plan. Orgon got back his property because there was not any fault of Orgon's and his family. Tartuffe was wrong and he was caught by the King. In this Act, author tried to give information about the importance of unity in family and consequences of trusting someone blindly.
